Extracts.

(From the Saturday Review.)

The season of 1860 hastens to its close. Yet a number of men, and its flickering light will not be extinguished. A few more months, and it will have disappeared in the ranks of faded wreaths. Its failures and successes, its irritations and annoyances, its follies and disappointments, are fading into thin air, and those spoken are forgotten all the little things that have been done are beyond recall. Another year in the history of organized society has passed away, and we have been added to the chain which unites the fashionables world of our day to the splendid and gay annals of the Regency. Many more changes have taken place in the lives of the members who are about to separate. There are times when self-examination is very painful, and there are times when it is a relief; but either way, it is a task which they should ask themselves returning to the shade of the ancestral oak, and lecture themselves upon their past. If any of those old young men would accept it, about whom, if their departure from the service had been to the interests of their State, and of all those who united a similar fate, it would confer a real service.
